Scholarly study of the Transportaion Act of 1920 which was aimed at reversing years of government opposition to railroad mergers and consolidations. The effect, however, was negligible. Despite plans overseen by the ICC, few mergers occurred between 1920 and 1940 when Congress finally repealed the Act. The author assesses the impact of the Depression, government action, opposition by labor unions and unions and railroad communities on the Act's overall failure. With foldout map of US railroads and lists of railroads that fell under the ICC's consolidation plan. 350 pages with index and appendices.
